Auto-split · split-compare

One choice, one page at a time

A two-way decision needs the question, both answers and the recommendation. On a tall page it used to keep the question and drop the recommendation.

What this deck shows

The run reads title, first option, second option, recommendation. The question rides every option page, because a comparison read one answer at a time needs the question beside each.

The recommendation lands once, on its own closing page. It is the component's own `.verdict` slot, not a page for leftovers — which is why this run always ends on four pages rather than three.

DECISION REQUIRED

Do we run the reviewer queue ourselves, or hand it to Northlake?

Volume triples in March either way; the question is who carries the load.

DECISION REQUIRED

Do we run the reviewer queue ourselves, or hand it to Northlake?

KEEP IT IN HOUSE

- Four reviewers to hire, eleven weeks to onboard
- Our clinical rules stay ours to change

Option 1 of 2

DECISION REQUIRED

Do we run the reviewer queue ourselves, or hand it to Northlake?

HAND IT TO NORTHLAKE

- Live in three weeks against their existing bench
- Rule changes go through their release train

the key insight →

Do we run the reviewer queue ourselves, or hand it to Northlake?

KEY INSIGHT

Keep it in house. The rules change monthly and a release train would set the pace of our own product.

RENEWAL

Do we price the March renewal per record, or flat?

The customer has asked for one number they can put in a budget.

The choice →

RENEWAL

Do we price the March renewal per record, or flat?

PER RECORD

- Tracks the volume we actually review
- The customer cannot forecast it

Option 1 of 2

RENEWAL

Do we price the March renewal per record, or flat?

FLAT PLATFORM FEE

- One number, forecastable, easy to approve
- We carry the volume risk in a growth year

the key insight →

Do we price the March renewal per record, or flat?

KEY INSIGHT

Flat, with a volume band. Forecastable for them, capped for us.

Why the verdict gets its own page

A recommendation printed beside each option reads as a caption on that option. Printed once at the end, it reads as the answer to the question the cover asked.

That is also what the un-split portrait page could not do: it kept the two option cards and pushed the recommendation off the page entirely, with no warning.

The rule, in one line

The question repeats; the recommendation lands once.
