Meridian

Where we are, what we shipped, and where we are headed next.

A year ago we were one product; today we are a platform.

Twelve months ago Meridian was a single scheduling tool with a churn problem. This quarter we crossed 10,000 paying teams on what is now a platform. This all-hands is about how we got here together — and the one big push that comes next.

Where we are now

10,400

paying teams on Meridian — up from 6,200 a year ago, and the fastest growth in our history.

The turning point: we stopped patching churn and rebuilt onboarding.

Last summer one in five new teams left within a month. Instead of more retention emails, we rebuilt the first-week experience from scratch. That single bet changed the trajectory of the whole company.

- The new onboarding cut first-month churn nearly in half.
- It freed the growth team to invest in expansion instead of leak-plugging.

Every number that mattered moved the right way this year.

— OPERATIONS LEAD, BRIGHTWAVE STUDIOS

What we are asking of each other for the rest of the year.

The ecosystem push only works if every team treats developers and partners as first-class users. That means shipping the public API with the same care we give our own product, and saying no to the work that doesn't serve the platform.

- Protect the API roadmap from one-off custom requests.
- Default to building on the platform, not around it.
