STATEMENT · CANVAS · PROSE

content

Generic prose slide — heading plus paragraphs or a short list.

STATEMENT · CONTENT

The content slide is the plainest tool in the box.

A heading that makes one claim, then a paragraph or short list that delivers it.

When no specialized layout fits, this is the honest default.

This is as much text as one slide should ever carry.

Two paragraphs is the working limit, and this is what the limit looks like when a slide actually reaches it. The measure runs four full lines here — far enough to show that body prose keeps its rhythm, and far enough to show why a third paragraph belongs in a document instead.

The second paragraph stays shorter — because by now the audience is reading, not listening, and every line spends from the budget the list below it draws on.

- One list is allowed after the prose
- Five items is where it stops
- Each item earns its line or loses it
- A sixth would run past the footer
- This fifth one is the last that fits

STATEMENT · CONTENT

The content slide is the plainest tool in the box.

A heading that makes one claim, then a paragraph or short list that delivers it.

When no specialized layout fits, this is the honest default.

STATEMENT · CONTENT

The content slide is the plainest tool in the box.

A heading that makes one claim, then a paragraph or short list that delivers it.

When no specialized layout fits, this is the honest default.

STATEMENT · CONTENT

The content slide is the plainest tool in the box.

A heading that makes one claim, then a paragraph or short list that delivers it.

When no specialized layout fits, this is the honest default.

When NOT to reach for content.

Forced shape into prose

If the content is a comparison, use compare-prose. If it's a list of options, use cards-grid. If it's a sequence, use list-steps. Reaching for content when shape exists wastes the slide.

Wall of text

More than 40 words and the audience tunes out. The layout doesn't fight back — it'll happily render a 200-word paragraph that nobody reads. Split or trim.

Multiple headings

Content carries one heading and one idea. Two h2s on one slide reads as two slides crammed together. Split into two content slides or use a structured layout.

RELATED COMPONENTS

See also.

`quote` — the prose IS a quote — let the quotation chrome carry it

`big-number` — the prose IS a metric — let the number carry it

`cards-grid` — the prose IS a parallel list of items

`compare-prose` — the prose IS a two-way comparison

`list-steps` — the prose IS an ordered sequence